The film centres around Bart Bromley (Tye Sheridan), a hotel clerk with Asperger's Syndrome who witnesses a murder on his overnight shift.

As he becomes prime suspect and the police investigation closes in, Bart makes a personal connection with the beautiful Andrea.

But he soon realises he must stop the real killer before Andrea becomes the next victim.

Next month will see Ana make her Bond girl debut as Paloma, alongside Daniel Craig in his final appearance as 007 in the 25th Bond film in the franchise.

With Fleabag writer Phoebe Waller-Bridge behind the script, Ana's role looks set to take on a more feminist approach with the star explaining that she wanted the female characters feel like “real people”.

In the wake of #MeToo, the film is being brought “up to speed” in other ways too.

The Sun previously revealed film bosses employed an intimacy coach to make sure the actors feel comfortable during sex scenes.

A film insider said: “Producer Barbara Broccoli and her team are going all out to bring Bond up to speed.
