Models ditch swimwear for bikinis made from TAPE in risque catwalk show which leaves nothing to WEâ€™VE seen a range of daring swimwear on Love Island but nothing comes close to a risquÃ© catwalk show where the models wore bikinis made from TAPE.

Duct tape bikinis - made famous by fashion label Black Tape Project - have made a return and they could be the most daring styles we've ever seen.

It certainly takes a lot of confidence to pull off this cheeky 'bikini'

The saucy show took place yesterday at Miami Swim Week and the eye-popping designs certainly set pulses racing.

One of the geometric designs barely covered the modelâ€™s derriere and simply had a cheeky diamond-shaped tape shape.

Others artfully adorned the womenâ€™s bodies in pink, purple and black pieces.

Who needs clothes on a catwalk when you've got tape?

The brand was founded by the "King of Tape" Joel Alvarez, and has turned heads with dazzling designs since its launch.

Joel was inspired to begin the trend over a decade ago while working as a photographer.

Writing on his website, he explained: "One day in 2008 I was a rookie photographer who was working with a model that suggested I use electrical tape her for the last look.

â€œI honestly had no idea why she would want this but to make her happy I attempted to use this tape as wardrobe.

â€œEssentially I just wrapped her in black electrical tape! Mind you she looked like two Christmas hams wrapped in rubber bands when I was done! (Iâ€™d never show you these images!)

â€œHowever, it sparked an idea in my head to develop this idea.â€•

This model flaunted the bold look on the catwalk and would have had to be careful to keep everything covered
